The beauty of a flower is similar to that of a woman. The phases that it goes through before it blooms, and then towards withering, are similar to the life stages of a woman.

The identity never changes. It was and still is a beautiful flower. Much like a woman. As a female visual arts practitioner, I explore the beauty and femininity of women, as well as their vulnerability. From bloom to wilt, every stage is memorable. The beautiful appearance will wither over time, but the inner beauty can bloom forever

Night of The Warrior Dance, 2013

This 2013 triptych by Filipino artist Andres Barrioquinto is a multi-layered work of characteristic ambiguity. Its formal qualities of composition, colour and motif enable it to be firmly situated within the artist's oeuvre of the early 2010s. It falls after the period where close-up, discombobulated mask-faces stand against flatly patterned grounds and the earlier Schiele-like graphic figurations, and the later forms of the mid-2010s where the faces are swarming with butterflies, flowers and insects against fragmentary landscapes.

Night of the Warrior Dance has the brooding qualities of other works of the period and the visual characteristics of a collage, despite the fact that it is entirely painted. The pseudo cut-out flowers, aniline-bright and clustered around the three heads that anchor each of the triptych panels in place, are a regular feature of works of this period. The birds emanate a Hitchcockian sense of threat, like a squadron of raptors in formation around the warriors' heads. The inclusion of the monkey in the right panel conjures Hindu folklore too, where Hanuman, the monkey warrior of the 5th – 4th century BCE Ramayana epic, is the avatar of the Hindu god Śiva, The Destroyer. The sense of tension and darkness is pervasive. The simian and avian imagery so dominant here is a visual language Barrioquinto frequently employs at this time; this can be seen in comparable pieces, such as Arms Around Your Love, 2011, sold at Sotheby's Hong Kong in 2011 for HK$550,000/ US$70,730 hammer, and again in 2018 for HK$1.6million/ US$204,400 hammer.

This period of production also sees Barrioquinto's most conspicuous use of Japanese woodblock imagery of samurai – the musha-e of the ukiyo-e tradition so popular and accessible in Edo period Japan. It is an artistic motif familiar far outside of Japanese culture too, its popularity in Europe and America from the 1860s onwards a direct result of violence as Japan was forced at gunpoint to open its borders to trade with the West.

The triptych format references the Christian altarpiece and could be interpreted as a reflection of the artist's own deeply-held faith, which drives his productivity:

Regarding my talents and abilities, these things come to me naturally and effortlessly, just like any other normal individual. I certainly have God to thank for bestowing me my talents. To show my gratitude, I never stop challenging myself as an artist. I always find ways to improve my craft and learn more techniques every day.¹

Like a Christian triptych, where the savagery of Christ's crucifixion is rendered in visually beautiful terms, the warriors here are aestheticised by their painterly treatment. This aestheticisation of violence is familiar to contemporary viewers not only through religious imagery of the past but also through popular cinema, where the macabre is played out like a refined dance or visual feast – think of film classics by the likes of Stanley Kubrick, Peter Greenaway or Quentin Tarantino.

The appeal of Barrioquinto's work is a result of his invocation of the past, of the deeply embedded norms of multiple cultures, and of popular culture in a way that is utterly contemporary. A work of this size and quality from his mid-career just when he was finding a mature visual language is a rare opportunity. Smaller works come onto the market occasionally, including The Wedding Present, 2013 (first exhibited and sold by One East Asia, Singapore, at Asian Art in London in November 2013), which was sold by Larasati in March 2021 for SGD36,000/ US$26,740 hammer.

Boats from Tegal

Ecstatic, alive, with saturated colours counterbalanced throughout the canvas, Boats from Tegal, 1983, is one of Affandi's late masterpieces. Fresh to the market, it sparkles. The composition is almost classical in construction, with the pyramidal structure rising to a loose pinnacle of masts breaking the sea's horizon. Reds play alongside greens and mango tints warm the inky blue that forms the framework within which the central motif of the boats are embraced. The blurs of colour Affandi rubbed into the canvas by hand form the depth that allows the oil paint squeezed directly from the tube to stand out through texture and gesture.

The striking clarity of colours in Boats from Tegal is not a happy accident but a direct consequence of the period in which Affandi painted it. Dated 1983, the early eighties saw the artist seeking to lighten his palette. In a documentary made for television in 1982 he explains his battles to express himself gesturally while also using colour to convey mood:

with dark colours, it's easier to express my feelings. But now I try to use bright colours. It is much more difficult to get the same effect with light colours. Before I know [it] I use dark colours again, but I have to keep on trying.¹

Often described by critics and curators as Expressionist, and indeed categorising himself in that way², Affandi worked quickly and spontaneously after intensely studying the subject of his painting. He would stop the moment he felt it was right. It was only after he ceased to paint that he judged whether the work was a success or not. In the 1982 TV documentary he states that he judges his own painting firstly to see if it's "good enough", then to see if he finds:

the feeling I wanted to put in it, back in this painting ... I am sure that what I see is a result of my feeling, emotion of that moment. And that moment has passed – I can't do nothing [sic] more.³

This way of working was something that the ground-breaking British art critic and author of Ways of Seeing (1972), John Berger, picked up on in his reviews of Affandi's peripatetic series of shows in Britain in 1952. Describing him as a "genius", Berger admits that Affandi can be "unequal, capable of badly erratic work" and that "the bad, insufficiently organised works remain bad because to Affandi they are as irrevocable as past actions".⁴ Berger's praise of the best pieces then frames them in a way quite different from other Western critics of the time. Rather than categorising Affandi's style through comparison to established Western painters, he writes without reserve that "Affandi has made, not consciously but instinctively, a real synthesis between Eastern and Western styles of colour and drawing." Recommending particularly the "large, violent, Indian town and landscapes, the huge, upright watercolours of beggars and the various pictures of unexotic animals" – the latter conveying the earthiness and urgency of Affandi's work that stood in stark contrast to the exoticising character of the better-known (at this date) mooi indies paintings of Indonesia – he then crystallises the uniqueness of Affandi's work:

It would be possible to label Affandi's work Expressionist, and to point out the similarities with Van Gogh and Kokoschka, but to do so would be very superficial. His work is different in kind from nearly everything being produced in Europe. And for this reason it shows a way out of the impasse now reached in Paris, New York and London [...] The strength and sensitivity of the good works is not the result of romantic identification, but rather of the endurance of a protagonist.⁵

Boats from Tegal, despite being painted thirty years after Berger was writing, stands as one of the great works. It fulfils every quality that Berger asserts but with the experience of a lifetime behind it.

Amis Maidens

Cheong Soo Pieng was an international artist in all respects. In parallel with his ability to fuse Chinese ink painting with Western modernist tropes, producing anything from precise linear figurative work lightly filled with muted tones to full-blown colour saturated abstractions, there ran a chameleon-like ability to fit into whatever international centre he occupied. In contradiction to the romantic image of artist as outsider, everywhere seemed to be home. Perhaps this is the paradox of the diasporic person who, having left their homeland, morphs constantly to fit in.

Amis Maidens is a rare subject for Soo Pieng. Although he first visited Taiwan as early as 1945, the year before he permanently left his studio in Shanghai to emigrate to Singapore, he did not have his first exhibition there – a group show – until 1971, at the Alpha Art Gallery's inaugural event in Taipei. However, it was in the last few years before his sudden death in 1983 that Soo Pieng tightened his association with Taiwan with two solo shows in Taipei: the first at the Alpha Art Gallery (1980) and then at the National Art Gallery (1981).¹ Sandwiched between them was another one-man show at the British Council in Singapore. This was the period in which he painted Amis Maidens, 1981, taking advantage of his trip to the island state to seek out the Amis people in Hualien county on the eastern coast, who make up the largest of the ethnic groups on the Han Chinese-dominated island.

His two Amis women in the painting bear the same figurative style that had its genesis as early as the 1950s and reached its characteristic mature form in the mid-1970s: linear, flattened with spaghetti arms and legs, inky almond eyes and large heads held improbably aloft on tiny spindle necks, minimally coloured. Throughout his life Soo Pieng was consistently drawn to indigenous communities of people who managed to retain some of their cultural traditions – codes of dress, festivals, music and dance – and this figurative style was born from his visits to Bali (the earliest being the seminal trip in 1952 with his colleagues from the Nanyang Academy of Fine Art in Singapore) and his observations of the Dayak people of Borneo.² The Dayaks' traditional wooden sculptures and ceremonial masks have the protruding almond eyes that are such a distinct feature of Soo Pieng's figures, but otherwise they bear the imprint of the wayang kulit puppets of Malaysia and Indonesia.

Wearing their characteristic red appliquéd and embroidered garments, which were made from cotton from the 20th century rather than the earlier bark cloth or rattan, the women's traditional clothing is faithfully reproduced with a top, skirt and headress in red and black, heightened with bleached whites. The effect is formal: the red primary, though subtle, anchors the shades of black ink brushwork like a wax seal on a Chinese calligraphy, or like JMW Turner's red buoy in his 1832 oil painting Helvoetsluys. Incidentally, Soo Pieng adored Turner.³ It can be difficult for the contemporary viewer to think of people in costume as living human beings, but photographs of today's Amis festival celebrations show that they are still wearing the same style of garments. A viewer of Amis Maidens might bring their imaginations to life by engaging more of the senses. Try listening to Enigma's anthem 'Return to Innocence' (1994), which samples the Amis people's 'Elders' Drinking Song' as a refrain in the dance hit.

Cheong Soo Pieng's Amis Maidens captures a particular cultural element of Taiwanese life. Testament to his association with the region was played more than three decades after his death when the flagship Asia Art Center in Taipei held a retrospective in 2017, Cheong Soo Pieng: A Centenary Celebration in Taiwan. This renowned centre, established in 1982, originally focused on Chinese emigrée artists who moved to Taiwan during the Second World War, but since then it has increased its scope to become a scholarly site for Nanyang School artists of Singapore as well as post-war Japanese Mono-ha.⁴ Soo Pieng holds a firm place as a representative of the former who transcended geographical boundaries, morphing to fit.

² Soo Pieng made two documented trips to Malaysian Borneo – to Sarawak in 1959 and Sabah in 1961 – where he observed the lives of the Dayak (non-Muslim indigenous) people. However, the centenary exhibition in 2017 at the Asia Art Center, Taipei, featured forty of Soo Pieng's works, most of which had not been shown to the public before; it included Sarawak Sisters, 1953 (oil on board), which suggests that Soo Pieng might have travelled to Borneo earlier than the documented trips.
